Mojirola Martina Fasiku is a medical doctor and a Consultant Public Health Physician at the University of Ilorin Teaching Hospital, Kwara State, Nigeria.

She is passionate about ensuring that patients are given the timely, correct and adequate information that will enable them to lead their care, particularly in managing their health problems.

She has also, at various times, been a patient and caregiver of patients, including terminally ill persons, and has experienced the everyday hassles and challenges of patients, caregivers and family members. These experiences strengthened her conviction that all patients should be treated as persons rather than their diagnoses.

She is an advocate of Persons and Family-Centered Care who feels strongly that patients and their relatives should be treated with dignity and respect, especially in Lower and Middle-Income countries where there are a lot of challenges with getting quality care and most healthcare financing is out of pocket.
